

MANDARIN ORIENTAL
NEW YORK

From the distant mysteries of the East to the splendors of the West, this menu traces the path of a navigator journeying along the legendary Silk Road. Across desert oases, spice-laden markets, and bustling ports, each stop reveals a new encounter — a scent, a flavor, an emotion — inspired by fellow Mandarin Oriental destinations around the world.

Through our signature cocktails, we invite you to follow his trail, discovering the contrasts, aromas, and visions gathered along the way.

Day 2

Under a pale and watchful dawn we made our berth in Peking, the Celestial Capital. The city stretches far as the eye may travel.

The air carries the scent of hearth-smoke and tilled earth, mingled with a strange scent — leaves steeping in boiling water.

The scholars call it cha. They say it clears one's thoughts as wind clears the fog. There is much wisdom in these streets, and I feel we stand only at the gate of learning.

Day 8

We cast anchor at Hong Kong just as the sun slid beneath the horizon, the shore ablaze with a thousand lanterns. This port hums with a certain grace and swiftness. Silks, gold, and rare perfumes fetched from every corner of the charted world spill from the shops like a treasure from a chest. Not far from the harbor, I found a marketplace laden with fruits unknown to me. Their skins bright as parrots, their scents as sweet as the trade winds.

Day 11

By the wide sweep of the Chao Praya we came to Bangkok.
Her temples clad in gold and set aglow by the sun. In the narrow streets and drifting boats of the floating market, the air is thick with the breath of spices. The fare here is rich and warm, awakening my tongue and spirit.
The city is a kingdom of flavor, the sacred and the common dwell side by side.

Day 16

We made landfall in Doha with the sun fierce. The desert wind sears the skin and robs the lips of moisture. Yet from that very dust the city rises, a vision against the stillness. It is a dream. In the market, a trader pressed into my palm a clutch of dates, warm from the sun, sweeter than any fruit I've known. He said it is the fruit of the desert, a gift of life where little grows.

Day 28

We entered the Golden Horn at first light, the city of Constantinople unfolding from the mist. Minarets pierced the morning sky and the harbor boiled with the clamor of trade. A kindly merchant bid me a taste of a small cup of coffee, black as a starless night and strong enough to set a man to his work. I drank it slow, watching the city stir in this meeting place of East and West, where the air itself tastes of spice and story.

Day 36

We entered Lake Como as the morning mist lifted, mountains standing guard above villas washed in sun-faded ochre and rose. Cypress and jasmine trailed toward the water, which lay smooth as blown glass beneath the keel. From a shaded terrace came the hush of conversation and the chime of distant bells. Into my hand was placed a bright, effervescent pour — alpine-fresh, kissed with citrus, alive with light. Lake Como is a harbor of pleasures, where beauty seems as common as the tide.

Day 43

We came to Marrakech with the sun low and the city burning red beneath its last rays. The souk winds like a labyrinth, each turn revealing wonders, brass lanterns casting firelight on woven carpets, mounds of spice in all the colors of a sunset. A merchant poured me hot tea from a height, its steam curling like smoke in the cooling air. This city is a maze of marvels, each corner a tale waiting to be told.

Day 58

We reached New York at first light. Her harbor thick with masts with vessels spilling forth goods from every sea and shore. The streets roar with the tongues of many nations, the people here are driven by trade, invention, and fortune. This is more than a city. There is ambition and hunger for the new, ever pressing onward, even beyond the horizon.

The voyages are not marked in miles alone, but in the flavors and scents gathered along the way. Each glass we pour is a compass point, a map drawn in taste.
Raise it high, and may it carry you safely onward,
with joy to light your next journey.
